

Should Individuals have the Right to Die With Dignity?

The human species has survived on this planet for about two million years. The average life expectancy has gradually increased from about 35 years to between 60 and 80 years.

Death is a certainty for all living things, in our western culture, death is not easily accepted. Human life is often prolonged against the wishes of the individual, even if it causes pain, suffering, humiliation and loss of dignity.

The question is, do individuals have the fundamental 'Right to Die' in peace, with dignity, without pain, worry or stress, where and when they chose?

The more appropriate question is, should any authority have the right to prevent a person from making this very personal and dignified decision.

Dignicide and Dignicist

The term Dignicide should be used to express a pre-planned dignified death initiated by a person in a sound mental condition.

A Dignicist is appropriate to describe an individual practicing the discipline of Dignicide. The role of the Dignicist would be to administer the appropriate procedure to end the life of the individual with dignity, without pain or humiliation.

The end of ones life should not be seen as a sad and painful loss. Reaching a reasonable age and having lived a useful and fulfilling life should be seen a great accomplishment.

More than seven billion people are currently on the journey of life; if they had a choice, how would they prefer to die?

Planning for the future should include the option to end one's life in a peaceful and respectful way.

... Trevor Wicks ...

TRENTEC INNOVATIONS

September 2013